

I'm growing out of all my clothes. It's been a while since they were fitting properly anyway, but now even my longer tees aren't quite cutting it and I'm relying more and more on my belly band to cover the space between my jeans and my shirt.

Enter a large stack of fabric and some simple and pretty patterns.

While the cats played hide-and-seek with the huge box the fabric came in I washed all of it and got it ready to go. Most of it is jersey so I don't feel like I need to iron it. There are also a couple of soft, lightweight pieces of wool, and a bit of cotton voile for something special. I don't know for sure I'll actually get all my ideas made up but large cuts of nice fabric can never be considered a waste. So far I've made up one skirt and a tee and will try to get some pictures of them this weekend when there is some light in the house.

p.s. The snuggler on that list is not for me. It's one of these. My sister says they are very useful and I believe her enough to try making one up. It should be cute anyway.
