

I started some new socks today. I know. I know. I've got three other pairs on the needles (in fact all of my 2.00 mm needles are in use right now) but I'd been waiting to start this pair for almost a month and when my yarn arrived I wasn't going to put them off any longer.

Here is "Orange You Glad" in Socks that Rock Lightweight; my colour choice for the Solstice Slip group. So far I smile every time I look at my yarn. It's just such a bright, cheerful colourway. Perfect for the coldest part of the winter.

(Ravelry link) knit-along that's currently going on in the Socks that Rawk!

My yarn arrived last night and I waited until lunch time today to take a picture of it before winding it up and putting it in my purse (along with the pattern and needles). My afternoon at work was sooooooooooooo long knowing I had new knitting just waiting for me but eventually I got to the end of the day and started the toe (I'm doing the toe-up version) while I was waiting for Rob to finish work.

I didn't say banana

Thursday, 20 January 2011 05:44

What is this? It's a small, rectangular, orange-colored knitted piece. It's made of wool and is being held by a hand. The piece is being held against a white card with some text and a small diagram. The background is a dark blue surface.